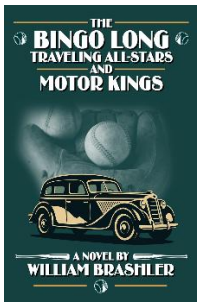
THE BINGO LONG TRAVELING ALL-STARS AND MOTOR KINGS, by William Brashler



The novel that spawned the classic baseball film is a funny, touching, and at times searing story of a barnstorming team's adventures on and off the field in 1930s America. Based on the author's numerous interviews with former Negro Leagues players. Far grittier than the hit 1970s movie, Bingo Long the novel puts you in the back seat of the big old Lincoln on the dusty roads of the Midwest, face-to-face with a country where systemic racism is a way of life.

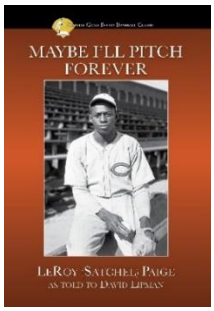
MAYBE I'LL PITCH FOREVER, by LeRoy Satchel Paige, as told to Walter Lipman



Satchel Paige is boastful, funny, and surprisingly introspective and honest in one of the first truly great baseball memoirs. Paige takes readers through the many amazing ups and heart-wrenching downs of his unique life and incomparable career. No writer could ever fully capture the magic and magnitude of this baseball immortal – other than perhaps the immortal himself.

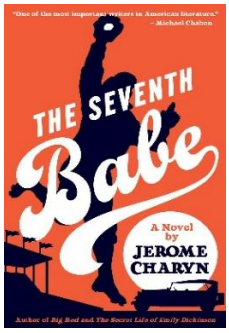
THE SEVENTH BABE, A Novel by Jerome Charyn



Babe Ragland bows to no one, not even Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis, who boots him off the 1925 Red Sox and out of baseball. But Ragland's passion for the game and the genius abandon with which he plays land him on a team of barnstorming African Americans, where he plays through the 1920s, 30s, and beyond. Magical reality meets black baseball in this brilliantly imagined and beautifully written novel by one of America's great contemporary authors.
